Excerpt: . . . inclined than usual to rebel at this remonstrance; and might have done so had she not been reading the Bible that morning. She had often felt that a chapter read and considered preserved her from much that was evil during the day, and believed she would have been much worse but for its influence. But, truth to tell, she had not improved in habits of carefulness: she was always borrowing, and forgetting to return. Her mammass keys, if confided to her charge, were never brought back in proper time; and it really was incalculable the quantity of annoyance she inflicted on herself and others. She would bestow great time and pains to learn a poem or a piece of music, and then forget either the beginning or the end. Annie was always resolved to conquer, but seldom cared to keep; this was still the...
