The Ferracute people use in their drawing-room large triangles having cut in them some outlines which they have to reproduce often in their rough sketches--as for instance, the heads of hex bolts, the conventional representation of screw-threads, etc. Holding Large Drawings on the Board. Since going through the Pennsylvania Railway shops at Altoona, a number of years ago, I have given up the old barbarism of holding large drawings on the board by glue or by drafting-tacks, and have used small copper tacks (about the one-ounce size) as being cheaper and more convenient to insert and take out, and as offering no obstruction to the passage of the T square and the triangle; besides which they have not the habit, as some have, of coming up into one's thumb (whence the name of thumb-tacks I suppose) on being pressed into a hard board. But in the Brown Sharpe drawing-rooms, where I knew that they had also been using for some time the ordinary copper tacks, I saw something which they say is better yet, and which for many things is supplanting the copper tack. They use small slips of gummed paper about three-fourths of an inch or an inch long and one-fourth of an inch wide, (probably suggested by the short strips on the edge of a sheet of postage-stamps, when one is lucky enough to get stamps with some stick em on them) and these make as firm a connection as is desired...
